FROM YOUR EDITOR

I find it hard to believe I'm starting my sixth year as Editor of the quarterly. Please write me with any of your ideas for upcoming articles. For the first time, I will also be mailing all the quarterlies so feel free to write me if you have any difficulty receiving quarterlies.

I want to extend a thank you to all our members who sent in charts for the upcoming Ancestor Book. I apologize for my incorrect home phone no. (days 933-5529/evenings 932-7567). Please continue sending these charts in. I will have a supply of ancestor charts at the next few meetings and we'll keep you posted on progress with this book.

The Rockville Cemetery Book will be available in February and hopefully all the remaining cemetery books will be completed in 1991.

CEMETERY RESTORATION

by Martin E. Weaver

Excerpts taken from The Construction Specifier.

Part I - Materials and Problems

Our early cemeteries are some of the most tangible, valuable aspects of our heritage. In one place, architecture, sculpture, fine lettering and calligraphy, beautiful natural stones, and landscaping combine to create a graphic historical record that documents our ancestors' lives and deaths.

Unfortunately, many fine monuments have been badly damaged by enthusiastic but unskilled efforts at cleaning and repair. Some of the worst damage has been caused by sandblasting to clean stonework, and by using unprotected steel or iron as reinforcement and connections. Often those responsible for the conservation, restoration, or maintenance of cemeteries seek help from overworked monument masons who may have a limited knowledge of current technology and materials for conserving or cleaning memorial materials. Since good technical advice is hard to find, seek information about qualified specialists and organizations from such groups as the American Institute for Conservation (AIC) in the United States.

Memorial Materials

Granites: Hard dense stones of igneous or metamorphic origin are usually known collectively as "granites", regardless of whether they actually are. Hard, lighter-colored stones, typically with a salt-and-pepper appearance and medium-to-large crystals, flakes of mica, and grains of black minerals such as hornblende, usually are granites. Hard, darker brown and red stones with large crystals, often with a polished surface, are usually gabbros. If such stones have smaller crystals and are of slightly lighter color, they are probably syenites. Polished hard stones that are black or blue-black with shining iridescent large crystals of feldspar are usually anorthosite, labradorite, or Norwegian Laurvikite. The most common granite sources were probably Vermont, from which comes a bluish-gray stone, and Stanstead, Quebec, which yields light gray stones with medium-sized gray-and-black grains.

Granites, syenites, gabbros, diorites, and anorthosites are usually the most intact stones in any cemetery. Of these, the compact, polished black anorthosites and reddish-brown or gray gabbros preserve best.

Slates: Early horizontal memorial slabs and vertical headstones or tablets in New England and in the maritime provinces of Canada were often of slate. Slate memorials are usually easily distinguished by their finely cut lettering and smooth, gray or blue-gray fine-grained appearance with thin laminations occasionally visible.

When slates fail, they can delaminate or split off in layers that vary from being nearly paper-thin to 1/4" or more in thickness. Other failures occur due to the weathering-out of the slate's softer patches or as a result of the nodules' chemical deterioration or inclusions of iron pyrites. When the latter occurs, the pyrites' remains are crumbled, rusty masses of particles, with deep holes in the stone and localized radiating crack patterns.

Sandstones: Sandstones come in various shades of gray, buff, brown, and dark red. Deterioration in sandstone memorials most often consists of the formation of a denser, less permeable, and more brittle surface crust that slowly blisters then spalls or exfoliates, exposing a softer, crumbling innercore.

Marbles: Marble is one of the finest, most commonly used stones in memorial construction. Fine white statuary marble and the less finely grained white marble with gray veining are most common. Marbles in polluted areas usually suffer from being dissolved by acid rain, snow, and fogs, or from "sugar decay" - that is, acid precipitation attacks along the joints or boundaries between the calcite crystals and comprise marble. The grains, or crystals, are ultimately loosened and can be brushed off like sugar.

Limestones: Limestones deteriorate for numerous reasons, but most often due to the penetration of acidic moisture. This causes a loss of carbonates or a transformation of the surface into calcium sulphate or, less often, magnesium sulphate.

Problems Encountered

In addition to harsh environmental conditions, weathering, and incorrect conservation techniques, several other problems can cause stone deterioration such as mixing stones, vandalism and metal corrosion. The corrosion of original or later iron or steel dowels, bolts, pins or cramps leads to the formation of expanding crusts of corrosion products with substantial increases in volume that can shatter surrounding stone. Unfortunately, broken stone tablets were often repaired by bolting iron straps across the breaks. The straps corrode and stain the stone surfaces, and the bolts expand, eventually splitting the stone in which they are embedded.

Memorial Metals

Iron: Three metals are commonly found in North American Cemeteries. The first and by far most common is iron, either wrought or cast. Iron was often used for fences around memorials and the cemeteries themselves. Most iron problems are related to metal corrosion in more polluted environments, especially where chlorides are present. Some cast iron sections are too thin and brittle.

Zinc: Also known as "white bronze", the second most common metal, zinc, was used extensively in the nineteenth century for elaborate monuments that were usually cast in sections and bolted together. Zinc memorials tend to be brittle and may be damaged by vandalism. Corrosion may occur in marine or in severely polluted industrial environments. Zinc corrosion is pH-dependent and occurs increasingly more often below pH4. Zinc corrosion products are generally white and consist of zinc hydroxide.

Lead: Lead is frequently found in lettering set into stone tablet surfaces. It was also commonly used for settings for iron dowels and rails, as buttons and sheets to facilitate the even bedding of stones, or as damp-proof membranes. Lead is attacked by alkalis and by organic acids found in soils and in industrial pollution near pickle or vinegar factories. Lead is subject to plastic deformation under load or "creep", and statues thus may have slumped or sagged under their own loads. When the surrounding stone is stained brown, red, or brilliant yellow, there may have been contact with incompatible stone-cleaning chemicals.

Part II - Kinder Conservation

One of the most basic principles of conservation states that the conservator should always use the most gentle means possible to obtain the desired result. In many cemeteries, the memorials are only dirty, but unfortunately there is a tendency to clean them with overly aggressive materials and techniques.

Stone Cleaning Techniques

Most soiling on granites, marbles, slate and limestone can be removed by simply washing with clean water and natural fiber or plastic brushes. Never use wire brushes. Soiling on sandstones may be much more difficult to remove as soiling may actually be in the surface. If deposits are not easily removed, progressively hotter water can be used, but the quantity of water should be kept to a minimum.

If soiling on marble or limestone is heavy in protected areas with some surface blistering and powdering in rain-washed areas, then a more complex approach is required. Trowel a poultice of de-ionized water mixed with kaolinite onto the surface, then wrap the whole poultice layer in gauze bandages to keep it positioned. The soiling will be pulled out and deposited in the poultice, which may be removed when dry. This process may also soften dirt enough to loosen and remove it with dentists', sculptors' or carvers' tools. Neutral soaps or detergents of pH 6 to 7. can also assist in the cleaning process.

Iron, Copper, and Bronze Cleaning

Stains from iron, copper, and bronze corrosion products may also be removed using poultices. To remove iron stains, first make a solution of one part by volume (pbv) sodium citrate: 6 pbv water: 7 pbv glycerin. Mix this with fullers' earth, kaolinite, or diatomaceous earth to form a stiff paste. Use a trowel or spatula to apply the paste to the affected surface in a layer about 1/4 to 1/2" thick. Once the layer dries and cracks up and cups, remove it with wooden spatula or scrapers.

Very bad iron staining can be removed using a sodium dithionite or sodium hydrosulfite poultice. Copper and bronze stains may be removed using a poultice based on ammonium chloride. One pbv ammonium chloride should be mixed dry with 4 pbv powdered talc. These should be mixed to a stiff paste with 10 percent ammonia water. The stained surface should be pre-wetted with clean water, and the poultice applied with a wooden spatula. Once the poultice has dried, it should be removed and the surface thoroughly rinsed with clean water.

Paint from graffiti and other sources may be removed by applying an appropriate paint remover in a poultice of fullers' earth or other inert material. Most paints will respond to a poultice made with a methylene chloride-based paint remover. Spray lacquers may require the use of poultice with lacquer thinner instead. Paint solvents should not be applied directly to the stone surface as paint may sink into the stone as soon as it is made soluble.

Readers are cautioned to carefully check all characteristics of any product they are considering using and to fully abide by all manufacturers' instructions or recommended safety practices.

Part III - Saving our Stones

Conservators are occasionally asked to recommend herbicides and biocides to prevent the growth of algae, fungi, mosses, lichens, grasses and broad-leaved plants on or around memorials. Unfortunately, no single substance can be safely used to prevent re-growth of all plants. Some biocides are toxic to man, domestic animals, and other mammals, fishes and birds. Others may be less toxic to the animal kingdom, but may cause crystal growth that can destroy memorial stones.

Chlorine-based bleaches, or hydrogen peroxide washes (3% in water) activated by a drop of ammonia, may be effective in removing some algae and fungi and preventing their re-growth for a short time at least. Copper sulphate washes may also help but can cause staining in white or very light colored stones.

Curing Curvatures

Stone slabs that span columns (as they do in table tombs) may sag, developing a pronounced curvature. Thin marble standing tablets that act as cantilevers may also start to bend and curve. Once a slab is several inches out of true, it will fracture. Once-vertical tablets can be straightened, though, thus reducing the load causing the curvature.

In the case of "table tombs" - tombs with a stone slab supported by stone columns or posts, just like a table - it is sometimes possible for conservators to take the slabs to a laboratory, turn them face down in a large bath of de-ionized water with a variable support system, and then over a period of weeks, "relax" the stone back to its original level surface. The stone slab is then dried carefully and can sometimes be replaced - with some additional supports to prevent a recurrence.

Dealing with Corroded Dowels, Cramps

"Box tombs" and mausolea must be treated like small masonry buildings and may even require careful dismantling and re-erection using suitable lime-based masonry mortars and non-corroding cramps and dowels.

Corrosion of the iron dowels and cramps joining the various stone units together is a common problem in memorial conservation. When the corrosion products on the dowels and cramps expand, they cause the stone to crack. If the dowels and cramps were set in molten lead, they may have survived intact. But if they were set in mortar, they are usually corroded. New dowels and cramps should be of stainless steel or bronze.

Fixed Delaminating and Broken Stones

Delaminating stone memorial slabs that suffer from face bedding problems may be conserved by drilling at right angles to the planes of separation and then setting in short pins of threaded nylon or stainless steel rods. The pins are set in moisture-insensitive epoxy resin with their heads set down below the stone's surface. The remaining hole is then patched with a stone plug set in tinted mortar or an epoxy-stonedust-mortar composite.

Broken stones and stone tablets or "dies" that have been detached from their bases can also be repaired using short lengths of threaded rods set in holes drilled at right angles to the line of the break or junction and set in moisture-insensitive epoxy. The epoxy resin in these cases should be kept well away from the stones' faces. Once repairs are made and the resins cured, the remaining joint lines can be filled with a lime non-staining portland cement and stonedust mortar to match the original clean stone.

When broken stone tablets or slabs are being restored and are having their fragments joined again using epoxy adhesives and dowels, it may be necessary to hold the fragments together until the adhesive has cured. Large sash cramps and strap cramps for joinery can be helpful in these instances, but be sure that cramp heads are padded with softwood blocks so the stone surface is not damaged. Waxed paper separators ensure that if some epoxy does reach the surface, it will not cement the clamps to the stone.

All lifting of stones should be performed with rubberized canvas, or webbing straps or slings that are specially made for this purpose.

Wedding in the Court Room

Taken from The Kankakee Gazette, April 19, 1877.

The tedium of ordinary business in the court room was relieved Wednesday forenoon by a marriage. The contracting parties were Chas. Kile and Julia Smith. The officiating clergyman was Wm. Aug. Smith. The event was the result of a bastardy suit taken up from the county court. Miss Smith is a petite woman, 23 years old, tolerably good looking and modest in deportment. The groom is tall red-haired (oh these red-haired men!) and wore a blue neck-tie. He seemed somewhat embarrassed and gave the responses in an undertone. The bride looked a little desperate and spoke the service in a clear, firm voice. After the affair was over, Judge Pillsbury spoke kindly to her and gave her a few words of fatherly advice. Others followed in sympathetic congratulations which brought the sobs from her breast. In a short time, the newly married couple departed, the husband carryin^g their babe in his arms; and the court room returned its wonted appearance again.

The short discussion of the subject: "Will the United States Absorb Mexico?" is well written in the "Chisel" from Richmond, a.

HISTORY OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF KANKAKEE.

Forty-four years ago had you stood on the Illinois Central viaduct looking over the prairie over which stands the city of Kankakee, you would have seen five school buildings, a frame building on the west side, where the Jefferson school now stands; a brick building near Soldier creek, used now by the Kankakee Stone and Lime Co., for a stable, a brick building near where Mr. David Durham's residence stands; a frame building down "in the flat" on Dearborn avenue between Hickory and Bourbonnais streets, and a frame building near the site of the Washington school.

But these were not city schools. Each was a district school, governed by a board of three directors under the common school law.

In 1861 Mr. Thos. P. Bonfield was superintendent of the county schools. Judge Chas. Starr was his predecessor in office. From their experience, they, with others, were of the opinion that the schools should be under the control of one body. Therefore Mr. Bonfield drafted the charter under which the schools are now governed. A public meeting of the voters was held at the court house. The draft of the charter was read to them and approved, presented to the next session of the state Legislature, and granted. This was I think, the fifth special school charter granted by the state of Illinois.

The first Board of Education was composed of the fifteen members who had formed the boards of directors of the five district schools. Mr. Richard Lavery was one of the members. During the term of office of this board plans were put in motion for replacing the frame building on the west side with a brick building of two rooms. At the next election the voters elected the requisite number of members of the board demanded by the charter.

In 1865 Mr. A. E. Powell was engaged by the Board of Education to fill the position of superintendent of the schools of Kankakee, and Principal of the High School.

Miss Annie Sinclair was engaged as his assistant. The old brick building spoken of on the corner of Chestnut and Indiana, was used for the High School department. This school was in a year or two removed to the "old Methodist church," now the City hall. Mr. Powell's assistants were: Mrs. Barnett, Mrs. Powell, and Miss Nettie Sinclair, in the order named. Miss Nettie Sinclair took the first graduating class through the High School.

The other district schools were used as ward schools.

The second great stride made for the schools was the building of the Central school in 1869. The members of the board were: Jas. McGrew, J. S. Taylor, J. C. Mateer, I. N. Dickson, A. Ames, President and R. Lavery, Secretary. All but two of the ward schools were abolished.

Mr. Rowell's corps of assistants was one High school assistant, and twelve teachers in the grades, and occasionally a teacher of German, French, or singing. Five classes graduated under Mr. Rowell, who remained with the schools twelve years.

On the resignation of Mr. Rowell in 1877, Mr. Chas. W. Rolfe was chosen to succeed him. In 1878 the large room on the upper floor of the Central school was brought into use, for the High school and one teacher added to the department. In this year the High School Debating and Literary society was organized. Three classes graduated under Mr. Rolfe. In 1881 Mr. Rolfe resigned.

Mr. F. N. Tracy was elected principal of the High School department and superintendent of the public schools, which position he has filled for over twenty-one years. It soon became necessary for the superintendent to give all of his time to the schools, therefore, the principalship was dropped from his duties and a principal of the Central school engaged. Later each of the ward schools, as well as the grammar grades of the Central school, were put under the control of separate principals.

During Mr. Tracy's incumbency the following named ward schools have been built: Washington 1883-six rooms, on Southside; Lincoln, 1887-six rooms, corner Chestnut and Dearborn; Franklin, 1892-four rooms, Northside; Lafayette, 1894-four rooms; Westside; Steuben, 1897-nine rooms, corner Wildwood and Bourbonnais.

There are now forty-nine teachers enrolled: The Principal, with five assistants in the High School, forty-three in the grades, and a supervisor of drawing.

In 1902 the ground was broken on the southern corner of the High school grounds on which to erect a High school building. The building is of brick, is perfect in the requirements for the education of the students of the present day and will cost in the neighborhood of $60,000. The board hope to dedicate it within a few months. The High school Alumni association are planning to hold their annual re-union in the assembly room of the new building. The High School Alumni association is the outgrowth of the Utile Dulci society formed of classes, who graduated under Mr. Rolfe and Tracy, to promote the growth of fellowship and interest in the schools, among the graduates of the Kankakee public schools. In 1889 it was expanded to an Alumni association, taking in all of the graduates since 1872. Between 1889 and 1900 the Alumni association languished and was brought to life several times, but in the latter year was put upon a firm basis. To the older generations of graduates among the names which are synonymous with the Board of Education, are Messrs. J. C. Mateer, Joseph Gefino, Richard Hanna, James McGrew, Richard Lavery, Doctors J. S. Taylor, A. Ames, A. L. Small and A. S. Cutler. The majority of the members of the last ten years are sons of the contemporaries of these men.

There are living in Kankakee at present four teachers of the first years of the new organization Mrs. Wesley Bonfield, Mrs. Chipman, Mrs. A. Ames and Mrs. William Kenaga. About three hundred and twenty-five have graduated since 1872.

Among those of national reputation who received the greater portion of their public school education in Kankakee schools are the Hon. Melville Stone, Rev. Frank Bristol and George Grey Barnard, the sculptor.

The Alumni is represented on the great metropolitan newspapers by David E. Sasseen, in the University by Fred G. Frink, and in the consular service of the United States by Claire A. Orr.

ANNIE BONFIELD.—81.
